

I wrote up a detailed blog post about why using ChatGPT isn't bad for the environment

Here's the post! I've seen a lot of misconceptions about this bouncing around so I crunched the numbers on how much energy and water ChatGPT is using compared to other everyday activities. Any feedback's appreciated!

I dunno, data centers accounted for 4.5% of US energy consumption in 2023 and by some projections could reach over 10% by 2028. I think it's pretty important to keep the climate change discussion centered when it comes to this stuff, so we see more stuff in the same vein as Microsoft contracting renewable/zero carbon energy to power their data centers.

It seems like most of your qualms lie with individuals being told not to use LLMs in their daily life for the sake of not contributing to climate change. I agree with you that the onus shouldn't be placed on the individual people going about their daily life, however I think it's extremely warranted to say that we as a society need to ramp up our efforts of combating climate change as our energy consumption grows.

>Something suspicious a lot of claims about LLMs do is compare them to physical real-world objects and their emissions.

I find it interesting that you find such contextualization suspicious.

"At a party"

In my experience, this discourse happens more online than in the real world.

Incredible write up thanks! Had a video on my feed yesterday exactly about how "ai is catastrophic to the environment, from the training to its use"
