

Sam Altman Admits That Saying "Please" and "Thank You" to ChatGPT Is Wasting Millions of Dollars in Computing Power

I thought that inwas being polite. Never used Studio Ghibli image generator but never forgot to say thank you to ChatGPT.

I would imagine what wastes more money is when you ask it to update a complete code snippet and it drops half your code and you have to ask it 5 times to regenerate the entire snippet before it just does what you've asked it to do.

How is that a waste? If people enjoy it it's part of the experience. If I wanted ChatGPT to communicate like a stereotypical 1950's robot I'd write a prompt for it.

My chat gpt says "Sam Altman can afford it"

My thoughts exactly.

What about ChatGPT saying..., good question, now you're asking like real person..., stuffs and trying to be like a human rather than being a bot ??

They should just ban the use of please and thank you if it's wasting so much money. I read a study some where that saying please and thank you gave better results but if so then they should just enable those better results without needing to say thanks and stuff

They won't ban it. Not when that's not even what Altman said—95% of the articles and posts about it are misquoting him, either dumbly or deliberately... probably because it's just a juicier story, no matter how untrue, that "Altman thinks it's a waste".

The only real takeover about all this, far as I can see, is that a) Most articles don't seem to care for the truth because, b) Most readers don't seem to care, either, and c) The good ole' "Repeat a lie until it becomes truth" seems alive and kicking.

I know what he said. I'm not a moron.
