

New info on ChatGPT environmental concerns

Posted by u/Adventurous_Data_318 • 0 points • 3 comments

Is this article true? It seems to under estimate every other article I see. I'm wondering if there is a bias involved with environmental concerns, and where this stands. What do u think?

They always talk about the gargantuan amount of water that data centers use, something like 100 million gallons per day or something I can't remember... but no one seems to realize that they only fill the data center with water once and it is infinitely recycled from that point forward.

I'd say that there is a heavy backlash coming from people who simply don't like AI using climate concerns as their basis for why it should be curtailed. That doesn't mean that it isn't a real concern. But I think it means that those people are more likely to conflate or omit statistic data to align with their narrative.

I just looked this up, they require constant water recycling and the big hyper scale datacenters can use over a million gallons of water a day. Some of the water is recycled, but about 75% is lost.

I'm a founder building AI products and want to understand this if I am going to be using and promoting its use. Does anyone have any more info on this? I would like to believe that this isn't an issue, and shouldn't be something to be worried about for the future.
