

Complaining about AI's impact on the environment from their 100% environmentally friendly social media that totally doesn't provide data to AI companies from their totally farm to table homegrown electronic device. /s

I seriously hate the environmental arguments against AI because it is just a weak straw to grasp at as an argument that, more often than not, uses falsified information. There are so many benefits to the world thanks to the introduction of AI including energy reform and usage in environmental science. There are actual arguments that can be made against specific aspects of AI's integration into society, but using this as your big "Oh, No, bad AI" immediately shows you don't care about the environment and only want to rage against AI. If you care about the environment, go after the actual issues affecting the world. If you don't like AI, actually learn about real issues and weigh them against the benefits.

AI doesn't have an impact on the environment, it's just that its being run by large companies. And I real saw this thing on anti AI subs like a million times

I prefer to chop down trees and give my art supplies vaguely racist names. /s 🐱

I've watched that sub for awhile and its almost only ever unintentionally ironic. Usually its just complaining about the internet whilst saying "ironic innit?"

u/MelodicWallaby4476 • 5 points • 2025-06-16 02:36 UTC

Actually pretty ironic how unwilling to discuss irony and jump to personal attacks several of them were when I posted it there. I expected some hate, but yeesh, very little debate, just discourse from people who wanted to be aggro and then say that they weren't part of the discussion.

that subreddit is so fucking ass, just like the rest of subs that fell into "AI bad and sucks" posts over and over like these people are genuinely mentally ill

"Guys one AI generated picture costs half a ocean to produce!!" People when they realize the water gets reused.

I love how the background implies this might be in the future and not in a conventional grocery store as we know them today.

Can't wait for this to be captioned with something tacky on some other anti AI shithole and get way more upvotes than it deserves.

i can kinda see it, in the sense that both AI usage and plastic bag usage get the "how dare workers do anything, pollution is their fault" stuff

Because this post is specifically about the environmental concerns of an AI generated image, I will also provide some links that I recommend others read if they have interest in the environmental impact of art for the sake of spreading awareness and hopefully encouraging other artists to consider their own waste and engage in introspective practices:

People who leave their television plugged in while not using it are doing more harm than someone using AI a few times a day.

u/Superseaslug • 7 points • 2025-06-15 23:34 UTC

Or add up all the chargers sitting at idle around the house. Or a dripping faucet. Or your AC too high

This nudibranch knows what it's talking about ^
