AI is not sustainable

I think it might be worthwhile (if you already use AI) to use ChatGPT on the free model as much as you possibly can such that their revenue to cost basis is negatively impacted.

I know this has its environmental impacts but as far as strategically hitting OpenAI where it hurts, this is where it will hurt the most.

Godspeed y'all!

This is standard business strategy: offer cheap service and operate at a loss -> capture customer base by being the most attractive option -> increase price to make huge profits

We will likely see an "enshittification" of AI services over the years as they try to offer less and ask for more. It's questionable how they'll retain their user base through this, because I don't see anyone except businesses and a few very avid users paying for an expensive subscription.

They're branching out into adult content which is a far cry from the purported "PhD in your pocket" that Altman was pitching only a few months ago.

The outlook isn't great.

That's the scarier part. Like don't get me wrong, getting all knowledge from AI and drowning in misinformation is bad, but we had that already.

However never before in history we were this close to replacing human connection and forgetting how to socialize. When we talk to machines instead of each other, we will be truly fucked.
