

Idk about the whole ai water things, but u will talk about this:

Ok, so basically it took 70,000 ai generated videos to make this, which is still bad imo, but yeah, image isn't true.

Ironically that shower probably does take up the water of several thousand of those Ad's... so it would work if you really didn't mind showering to support coke for some reason.

from what I see AI video generation takes about 2-12L of water per hour of video, the coca cola ad is 1 minute so 70000 minutes is about 1166 hours of content which is 2333 to 14000 liters of water, a 5 minute shower 150L of water are consumed so at worst that's 93 showers which I get the avg redditor doesn't get to consume in a lifetime but for normal people is not such a big quantity when put into perspective

Wait until they hear about 3D rendering and how much processing power and water that takes.

They generated 70,000 clips to make the one full featured ad. I dunno, considering how it's not even very consistent or good-looking, looks like way more work and energy went into it than it should've.

I like AI videos but the coke one wasn't very good all things considered. Looked like AI.

I'm just confused like, they did each take 3000 times? Why??

Skill issue

Well, when you generate stuff, it can be hard to guide it to do what you want it to do. I don't think the tools are there yet to execute a vision when you need it to be as perfect as possible. So, yeah, prolly 3000 per shot. they picked the best one and edited what they could.

u/bunker_man • 1 points • 2025-11-24 23:49 UTC

I understand the need to curate stuff, I just don't think the quality of the video is such that it reflects having sorted through three thousand different takes of each shot.

Yeah, I don't know. The people who made the video said they generated 70,000 clips. I agree though, the commercial looks kinda shitty for 70k generations.

Even so this sounds incredibly ineffective. It sounds like the professional tools aren't in the right place right now. Or more optimistically, this is essentially a big proof of concept as they work to improve their skills and workflows
