Haven't read through all of this, but posting because I've read some and it seems interesting. Would be interested to see what others think!

This is all a good summary of the industry talking points. I can't tell if the author is just ignoring the training vs usage questions but who cares.

The main thing I think this all misses is the US is doing an infrastructure build up the likes we haven't seen for a century, but so far people aren't feeling the benefits of AI.

This article for example claims that "hundreds of millions" of people are using AI.

Anyone who uses Google these days can be said to "have used AI" though. Increasingly it's just part of using the Internet.

But I highly doubt more than a few hundred thousand people are using AI in a way that fundamentally changes their work or lives more than a curiosity.

Meanwhile everyone is feeling pressure from this massive infrastructure build out. And it's not even a big jobs program, in fact with AI displacement each data center built probably is a net job loss.

All the industry talking points can't make people look away from the obvious.

62% of US adults report using it at least once per week, and that's just their reports. Studies also show that people are often using it when they don't know they are -- as you say, using Google search constitutes using AI at this point, and so does watching Netflix.

Okay not wot counter point this how about you show us a article not written by someone that has money invested in to AI. as that is how you started it and it kind of derails your point here.

As since he invested money in to AI, it is only common sense that he would say that. Objective views on it would be more honest.

Who is he? There are a ton of links here and the ones I clicked into aren't from AI investors. Not mentioning it kind of details your point here.

>as that is how you started it and it kind of derails your point here.

What? I didn't "start" it in any way. What point does it derail? I even stated that I haven't read the whole thing. You might want to use Grammarly when you write your responses, because your sentences lack clarity.

>As since he invested money in to AI, it is only common sense that he would say that. Objective views on it would be more honest.

Okay, sure. Where are the objective views? This person is steel-manning the position pretty hard if you read the article, but if you have better or more detailed data, I'd love to see it.

Your the OP, and you didn't start it?

That is a odd bit of logic.

Please tell me how the OP doesn't start a thread.

You said "as that is how you started it and it kind of derails your point here."

What is "how" referring to in this sentence?

What point is my post derailing?

if you where here to honestly partake in conversation you would have noted that I motioned how the person for the initial URL you used and kept quoting from, has money invested in to AI, so he's not a reliable source of information.

AS he invested money in to it, he is going to do what he can to promote it as he profits off AI. A purely objective source from someone that never invested in to AI would be a lot better.

I already said:

>Okay, sure. Where are the objective views? This person is steel-manning the position pretty hard if you read the article, but if you have better or more detailed data, I'd love to see it.

Well it doesn't matter now as your post was removed by Reddit itself.

The water issue is just one of the current lines of attack. The issue really isn't about the water. If they were so passionate about that they would all stop eating beef and almonds.

Yes it's a perpetual game of shifting goalposts. But I think it's becoming harder for them to deny that.
