

Prove me wrong: Antis do not care about the environment. It's just a performative talking point to attack AI.

In every single "AI is killing the planet" talking point, there is always an industry that does it 3-4x as worse than, for some reason, gets a pass. For No one cared about water waste until AI showed up, for instance.

Fashion, as an entire industry, especially the "trendy" type, has historically introduced more environmental concerns, including water usage, compounded with worker abuse, and yet antis don't care.

Atmosphere concerns regarding the heat AI produces is completely null because it's only a fraction of emissions worldwide. Transportation is still, and will always be, the leading issue.

Energy usage is another problem they try to cite, and yet there are bigger players contributing to larger funnels than AI could ever dream of. It's fine and dandy when a Data Center is guzzling power to keep their Facebook albums alive, but when someone dares to ask an AI a question, they're the devil?

Antis do not care, and I challenge anyone to show me that this isn't just the latest excuse for outrage, spread by well poisoners who want to farm engagement and mob think off of people who are too internet illiterate and emotionally invested to do research.

People oppose AI for different reasons; and they aren't one homogeneous group.

You don't need any more „proof“ than „don't generalize and paint your opponent s a caricature.“

Anyone who actually cares would be more worried about the actual environmental impact. Antis care about making AI seem worse than it is.

They have a conclusion in search of evidence. It used to be that the images were terrible and couldn't do fingers. Then it was that it would be a copyright violation.

Now that those haven't panned out it's going to kill the planet and who cares about the law, you have to adhere to their morality that supersedes law.

If that doesn't work, they'll try something else.
