

I'm here to brainstorm. So, with CERTAIN, NOT ALL megacorporations irresponsibly draining environment resources even further, now when they use AI (wrong kind of usage to be exact), how can we combat this problem? Even with this problem existing for a longer time, what can we do?

Posted by u/MCligmaMC • • 0 points • 12 comments

The problem existing for a longer time, I ment the problem of corp. greed and environment destruction, even without AI. I just want to know, how can we reduce this kind of AI manipulators and combat them for the better future (which does NOT equal to shut down AI completely)?

I'm personally NOT anti-AI as I know you can use it and still be fine, but do those corporations fall into that category? Face it, now when they use AI, the environment problem got even worse. But like I said, it's still a tool that just needs to be in a right hands more often than in the wrong ones.

I would compare AI to shooting guns, let me explain. Guns are dangerous and misused by bad people, but that still doesn't completely shut down how they can be necessary to exist as well, like when some rangers shoot sedating darts to sedate frenzy animals with... guns. Even AI has risky usages, but it also can be useful AND harmless in some kinds of being used.

Sadly, you give credit to a SPECIFIC AI users and boom, you're apparently complete "pro-AI". When you criticize someone for obvious wrong use of AI even if u state how it can be used better than that, boom, you're "anti-AI".

It's also not helpful how some of these corpos make so much money already that the negative feedback barely scratches the surface on them. AKA "too big to fail". So, any ideas to combat them?

Comments

u/TrapFestival • 1 points • 2026-01-17 18:43 UTC

The Individual's Guide To Significant Change - Cheap, Legal, Effective. Pick two.

u/Human_certified • 1 points • 2026-01-15 22:02 UTC

Fun facts about AI "megacorporations": Anthropic: 800 employees; Cursor (coding): 150 employees; Perplexity: 54 employees; Suno: 20+ employees; Midjourney: 10+ employees. :)

AI is not "draining" anything. That implies "using up" some finite natural resource. Instead, some data centers in some parts of the world use water for cooling, which they then return unpolluted to the environment. Water is ubiquitous in 75% of developed nations and considered a nuisance in many of them (the Netherlands). Meanwhile, all data centers use electricity, which may be generated with anything from coal to wind to hydro.

AI is the cleanest major industry on the planet by far. It is, however, an industry. And new industries don't join the back of the queue hoping there's room at the front one day. They compete and push out existing industries.

Also remember that if we had "decentralized" AI, with everyone running their own models on their own machines, that would be exponentially worse for the environment in every way: more parts to manufacture that sit idle all, dumping heat into private homes and inefficient ACs, etc.

Big, ugly, centralized data centers run by corporations are the cleanest and greenest way to have AI.

u/AroISazir • 1 points • 2026-01-15 19:40 UTC

The best thing to do would be to apply existing anti price-fixing and anti monopoly laws fairly. That'll be enough to break up the nvidia-openai-intel circlejerk, and force the market to produce what is actually needed and economically feasible, instead of what they are doing right now, which is just investing in a circle to pump out the market value, because the government gave them direct access to the money printer, and investing the profits into buying out competition. The market will sort itself out given the chance, and wasteful, destructive spending will be curbed, the moment these companies stop being propped up by the money printers.

u/Decent_Shoulder6480 • 1 points • 2026-01-15 19:24 UTC

Please explain how corporations are incorrectly using AI.

Thanks.

u/EtherKitty • 1 points • 2026-01-15 18:51 UTC

Only way is to get enough people to protest the company and any company controlled by any parent companies of that company. It's technically possible, but it would take a lot of cooperation and information gathering to get to an adequate point.

For example, Walmart is one of the largest grocery and general store chains in America. Cheapest product, highest sales, uses ai for basic storage tracking. Literally unnecessary and probably less efficient. Many communities rely almost completely on their local Walmart because no other store can afford to start in that region.

u/lmhotep99301 • 2 points • 2026-01-15 18:17 UTC

That's the neat part, you can't. If the company is big enough they won't care or even notice "protests" or just throw the anti AI crowd a bone for free press. And if they're small enough to feel the pressure, then the anti-AI crowd is just bullying.

u/Cold_Complex_4212 • 1 points • 2026-01-15 19:30 UTC

Wait, so people should do nothing because they're either ineffective or bullies? This isn't even about ai just your logic

u/MCligmaMC • 1 points • 2026-01-15 18:25 UTC

At least you aren't hostile on me like others. But still, these companies, again not all of them, can be corporate as they want and we can't do anything to reduce that? Not to take them down, but rather to force them to improve their ways.

u/Fakeitforreddit • 1 points • 2026-01-15 21:10 UTC

The issue is were about 60 years past the point when peaceful action would solve things... that needed to happen in literally the 1970s.

until people learn that the action taken by the people has to have an immediate effect we can't do anything about it.

The little one day of don't shop at amazon or stand with a sign in front of a building hoping the execs and C-suite will see your Witty pun sign and change their minds is the dumbest shit ever.

They know the people are morons, they see them standing there with their stupid signs, freezing in the cold, crying at the air. They are literally looking at you and thinking "man these people are so fucking stupid, we are untouchable".

u/Remarkable-Title-387 • 1 points • 2026-01-15 18:15 UTC

Are you willing to convince everyone you know to go on a mass strike and grind the entire economy to a stand still?

Are you willing to take a road trip to the capital and reenact Jan. 6th so the government will understand that not just maga, but all of us are tired of this arrangement that seems to be benefitting a tiny portion of us more than others?

The Chinese can make Xi Jinping their bitch as soon as they get tired of all the bullshit they have to put up with and they've successfully done so a couple of times in spite of how much the CCP doesn't want the world to know about it.

So it is very possible we can do the exact same thing as soon as we give up on this economy and step off the hamster wheel keeping it going for a few months.

I can guarantee they'll do more than lip service because AI isn't even remotely good enough to replace all of us and the H1B's can't be brought in fast enough. ICE is already fucking over the illegals for absolutely no reason because Trump desperately needs them as a scapegoat to maintain support from his base. The irony is rich (lol) because they have directly contributed to padding his and other billionaires' wallets with billions of dollars.

There's a reason why some of them have gone on TV to actively complain about losing their modern day slave labor even though they knew what they were voting for.

Otherwise, we'll have to do it the good old fashioned way by voting for politicians who actually give a damn and want to rebuild our country from the ground up like we did centuries ago.

Unfortunately, voting takes way too long and people are getting tired of the system yesterday, so unfortunately some drastic measures will have to be taken.

I'm open to suggestions, but at this point I'm almost hoping some kind of coup actually happens because it would be kind of hilarious.

However, propaganda and our lack of a true national identity makes them are very hard sell and keeps us divided.

u/MCligmaMC • 1 points • 2026-01-15 18:20 UTC

I was just tackling corporate greed by corporations that even myself said that are just some but not all of them. Why are you bringing up Trump, whole economy etc.?

u/Remarkable-Title-387 • 2 points • 2026-01-15 18:31 UTC

Because the corporate greed is enabled by our entire government..

The Democrats just hide it much better by focusing on social issues that don't really much of anything in reality.

If inflation and record high corporate profits weren't slowly driving us into deeper poverty, then we wouldn't have people contemplating storming the capital a second time but with more numbers and a complete disregard for your actual political beliefs.

The Humanist Report just released a video talking about people posting this stuff on Tiktok the other day, so class consciousness is actually seeing a big comeback.

If AI were the only problem then we wouldn't have a problem with the industry at all, but it affects pretty much everything in a minor yet significant enough way to be a big fucking deal to someone on this rock.

Therefore, we should probably just burn the whole thing down because publicly traded corporations and venture capital are the actual problem with this system.

A good example of a corporation that should keep existing is Valve.

I can't really make any arguments for why the rest deserve to exist because every job I've had has felt like a scam, which hasn't changed since I am now a gig worker even though I benefit greatly from this arrangement.

u/No_Sense1206 • 1 points • 2026-01-15 18:02 UTC

Do you see that call to action as something that will change anyone mind? I understand that you will not change for anyone but is your goal to sound that way or make people be that way?