If AI art is just a "tool," why does it require millions of non-consensual works and massive energy costs to function?

I've been thinking about the pro-AI arguments lately, and I keep coming back to three things:

I've seen so many posts mocking "traditional" artists, claiming a simple drawing is worthless compared to high fidelity AI. But for me, the second I find out something is AI-generated, the impressiveness evaporates. Because we all know what its like to draw, its a shared human experience we've all felt since doodling in class or making something by hand.

Many artists explicitly licensed their work not to be used for training, yet their life's labor was taken to build a commercial product against their will. You cannot separate the tech from the data it was built on, if the foundation is an ethical violation, the tool itself can't be ethical. We are essentially devaluing human agency while relying on a system that requires massive amounts of energy and water to function.

The environmental cost is staggering as well. We are burning through natural resources and cooling servers with liters of fresh water just to generate .

I posted this just to create a discussion as I want to hear other opinions as well
