

An AI Class at an Environmental College

This is getting extremely concerning. My school recently had a field trip to our local marine biology college to see a class on AI. Considering that this is literally a college about the ocean, I thought that the class would be about the negative effects it has on the environment. Instead, they basically just told us how to prompt pictures. When I asked a teacher about the negative effects it had on the environment, because I figured my classmates might listen if it came from her, she just brushed me off and said to ask someone who's "more knowledgeable." Excuse me?! You're teaching an AI class to children and you don't even understand the actual impacts it has on the environment? I feel really bad now, because I prompted some images in that class, since I was under the impression that this OCEAN COLLEGE had maybe found an AI engine that had less of a negative impact. But that definitely wasn't the case. The worst thing is that now all of the kids in our district are gonna go home and start prompting AI to create images, without even knowing any of the downsides of it! It's infuriating! How could a marine biology college, of all places, promote AI like this?
