

Why do people care about AI killing voice acting, but not about green energy killing the fossil fuel industry?

Posted by u/dpp4me93 • 0 points • 26 comments

I know there is the obvious fact that fossil fuels are bad for the environment, but I still feel people are dismissive of people/families/communities affected. They're expected to learn new skills and change professions after technological advances, why aren't voice actors expected to do the same?

To be clear, I'm liberal af, pro union, want a 4 day/32 hour work week, Medicare for all, UBI, etc. I also don't think that studios should be able to use AI to recreate individual performers image/voice/likeness. I'm just noticing that there seems to be more sympathy for one group of workers than another.

Comments

u/pos_narendra • 1 points • 2024-01-29 00:43 UTC

Graphics designer spend 4 years studying to hone their creative soul. Fossil fuel workers spend a day training to rape the environment.

One deserves to lose their job, the other doesn't.

u/pos_narendra • 1 points • 2024-01-29 00:42 UTC

AI should be replacing monotonous/tedious jobs like factory organization - not creative jobs that require performances. These are the fun jobs. Its being applied to the wrong workforce.

u/GeekShallInherit • 2 points • 2024-01-28 19:26 UTC

The world is a better place for switching to green energy? Is the world a better place for switching to AI voice acting?

I have sympathy for just about anybody losing their job, and I believe we should work to ensure they have the resources they need to get by and find a new job (assistance while unemployed, assistance training, etc), but I'm only going to support protecting jobs that benefit society.

I'm not even sure I understand what you're arguing. Do you think I should support protecting jobs equally even if they're destroying the future? Do you think I shouldn't support protecting jobs that benefit mankind?

u/dpp4me93 • 1 points • 2024-01-28 19:33 UTC

I'm not arguing for anything. I think I'm similar to you where I have sympathy for people losing their job, and I acknowledge that the older/more settled a person is, the harder/more intimidating the process would be. But if the job no longer benefits society, workers should be supported while transitioned to a new career.

I certainly don't think we should continue mining coal and drilling oil cause 'Merica. I just think people are generally dismissive and don't appreciate how hard it would be for people to acknowledge that what they've done their entire adult life is no longer viable.

u/GeekShallInherit • 1 points • 2024-01-28 19:43 UTC

I think most people are about like me. To the extent people may have some animosity towards fossil fuel industries, it's likely because they have been working directly against climate change initiatives, and in some cases actively spreading propaganda they know to be false.

While not all workers may agree with those agendas, a great many do, and it's appropriate to be hostile towards that.

u/Whoopassatron138 • 1 points • 2024-01-28 17:34 UTC

Actors/Hollywood/arts have a much bigger platform through which to express their discontent. They are able to make people more aware.

Unfortunately, the people being affected by the changes coming to the energy industry don't have the same clout and platform as famous actors.

Also, there is the perspective that green energy is good for humanity and AI is potentially bad for humanity. The principles are bigger than the people it affects. Which I think is unfortunate.

u/dpp4me93 • 1 points • 2024-01-28 18:12 UTC

Personally I think green energy is good, and I think that AI is good as well. I think it's bullshit that AI will just be the newest technological advancement that should make workers lives easier, but will only be used to increase profits by allowing employers to replace them with said technology.

UBI, Medicare for all, 32 hour work week.

u/Whoopassatron138 • 1 points • 2024-01-28 18:44 UTC

That's what really bugs me the most. There hang enough being done or considered for the people this no technology abandons.

It's almost a form of sociopathy: "Well, that's what they get for not keeping up". Like, people somehow deserve to suffer for it.

u/dpp4me93 • 1 points • 2024-01-28 18:56 UTC

Yeah, I can't remember who/what I was watching, but it's the bullshit idea that when a new technology comes out and it requires 50% less labor to produce the same amount of product, the employers decide to fire 50% of the workers instead of simply reducing their workload.

u/oneeyedziggy • 2 points • 2024-01-28 16:59 UTC

> people are dismissive of people/families/communities affected.

if they were in the rape industry... helping rape people... would you feel bad for them?

it's not that extreme, there's a lot of grey area... but the fossil fuel industry is knowingly responsible for millions of additional deaths and countless additional prolonged illnesses every year... millions dead, like more than the holocaust per year, not to mention the additional non-death suffering. A portion of that being a necessary evil for now, but even that is squarely on the oil industry... the disinformation the industry has put out, and the lobbying money they've paid to keep from being regulated, and to stifle the development of and market for renewables shows they're complicit in their continued harm...

Everyone's known for easily 30-50 years that those companies are basically evil... so, you do what you have to to feed your family, but working for them, you know it's at the expense of others' lives and shouldn't be surprised when the dying industry you joined dies... Even so, it's not about hurting working families, however complicit they were in harming everyone (except high level execs who could have stopped it with a word, or steered the company towards renewables 50 years ago), but they should all rapidly be shunted over into renewables-related work... I'm all for forcing the oil companies to switch over to renewables or cease operations, and pay for re-training their existing work force... again, it's not about hurting working families, it's about getting them to stop hurting ALL families. They're killing MILLIONS of people a year, and it needs to stop (and no, renewables won't take it to 0, but hopefully the low thousands would be an achievable but still huge improvement for now).

u/dpp4me93 • 2 points • 2024-01-28 17:04 UTC

Fellow human that comparison is disgusting and I'm not reading past that second sentence. That is the level of arrogance, superiority, and indifference I am talking about. People who work in the fossil fuel industry are not rapists, or enablers of rapists, and should not be compared to either. They're often people that live in rural, low income areas, that don't have a lot of options professionally or educationally.

u/oneeyedziggy • 2 points • 2024-01-28 17:27 UTC

> People who work in the fossil fuel industry are not rapists

I see you were serious about not continuing to read... the point is that it's disgusting... they ARE helping to kill millions of people a year... and if you don't care about distributed murder, I'm glad you at least seemingly care about rape...

try reading the rest.

u/dpp4me93 • 1 points • 2024-01-28 17:37 UTC

No thank you.

You could have made the point that fossil fuels are disgusting without comparing the workers to rapists and murderers. But you're an inflammatory, reactionary, self righteous jackass.

u/oneeyedziggy • 1 points • 2024-01-28 17:55 UTC

> You could have made the point that fossil fuels are disgusting without comparing the workers to rapists and murderers. But you're an inflammatory, reactionary, self righteous jackass.

you ask why people are not compassionate about the fossil fuel industry workers... their supporting an industry that is LITERALLY (this isn't a metaphor, or hyperbole)... killing more people than the holocaust every year.

I think hoping they're transitioned as expediently as possible to jobs in renewables is rather diplomatic considering their indirect role in annual mass murder and causing a massive amount of undue suffering. They are LITERALLY working for an industry known to unnecessarily kill large amounts of people every year... and it seems reasonable to wish they would stop doing that. I somehow don't wish ill on them (only the execs of those companies, who should be locked up for the public good)... just that they would more rapidly seek (and the government would more actively force) a transition away from fossil fuels.

if you find that outrageous you... you're starting to understand.